The Class Election

When Ms. Patel announced that the fourth grade would elect a class president, Jamal decided to run. So did Sophie, the most popular girl in class.

Sophie made colorful posters with glitter and handed out stickers that said "Vote Sophie!" She promised that if she won, everyone would get extra recess every day. Kids cheered.

Jamal wasn't sure he could compete with glitter and promises. So instead of making a speech right away, he spent a week asking classmates what they wanted to change. He made a list. Many kids wanted a class library with more books. Some wanted to be allowed to sit with friends at lunch. Others wanted the broken pencil sharpener fixed.

On speech day, Sophie went first. "Extra recess for everyone!" she shouted. Then Jamal stood up. "I can't promise extra recess," he said. "The principal decides that. But I asked all of you what you want, and here is my plan." He read his list and explained how he would work with Ms. Patel on each idea.

When the votes were counted, Jamal won by four votes. Afterward, Sophie walked over and shook his hand. "Can I help with the class library?" she asked. Jamal grinned. "I was hoping you'd say that."
