The Unexpected Hero

Everyone at Pine Ridge Elementary knew Ellis as the quietest kid in fourth grade. He rarely raised his hand and always ate lunch with a book. Some kids called him "the Ghost" because he barely made a sound.

On the class field trip to the nature center, a ranger led the students on a trail through the woods. Halfway through, Tanya slipped on a muddy rock and twisted her ankle. She cried out in pain. The ranger was at the front of the line, far ahead, and the teacher was helping someone at the back.

Everyone froze, except Ellis. He knelt beside Tanya and said calmly, "Don't move your foot. Keep it still." He took off his backpack and placed it under her ankle to raise it. Then he told Marcus to run ahead to get the ranger and told Priya to get the teacher. "I learned first aid in a book," he explained softly.

When the ranger arrived, she checked Tanya's ankle and nodded. "You did exactly the right thing," she told Ellis.

The next day at lunch, Tanya sat down next to Ellis. "What are you reading?" she asked. Soon three more kids joined them. Nobody called him the Ghost anymore.
